

| | More from Globe OpinionSubmit a Letter to the EditorMeet the Editorial Board

LETTERS

Why fewer men on campus? Because they don't feel welcome there.

Updated February 6, 2026, 2:20 a.m.

Emerson College in Boston. DAVID L. RYAN/GLOBE STAFF

As a guy who recently graduated from Emerson College, I read Hilary Burns's article about the drop in college enrollment among men with interest (“On campus, a dwindling presence: male students,” Page A1, Feb. 1). What particularly resonated with me was the quote from the alumnus of the University of Vermont who said male students feel “like there are a lot of people on campus who judge them.” That's true: We don't feel welcome.

For the three years I was earning a master of fine arts at Emerson, I knew I was skating on thin ice. When I spoke up in class, I did so carefully. I even had a classmate tell me, “I'm impressed you've gotten people to like you. That's pretty rare for a straight guy in an MFA program.”

It shouldn't be an accomplishment to avoid being a pariah.

Christian Sears

Medford

Show 27 comments